LINES

WRITTEN IN A LADY'S ALBUM FOR THE LAST TIME.

No more upon thy "virgin page,"
The poet's burning line I'll trace;
No more record the thoughts of sage,
Or give the lover's tale a place.

And now at parting, if a tear
Of sorrow steal from out mine eye;
Oh! let that drop be doubly dear,
Shed as it is, for constancy!

To sever for a time gives pain,
With pleasurable feeling fraught;
But parting, and to meet again,
Brings something dreary with the thought.

When darkness is my only bed,
And death's cold shadows press around,
And when I ne'er can lay my head,
But on the chill and lonely ground;

Will thy perusal bring to mind,
Some thought of him, who penned this line,
And will my silent spirit find
A tender tear of sorrow shine

In thy sweet owner's gentle eye?
And, will her softened accent say
One little prayer of sympathy,
For him who shall have passed away:

Oh! if it do,—my spirit shall,
(With transport more than tongue can tell;)
Shine thro' the darkness of its pall
With tears of joy.—But—Fare thee well!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS, &c.

We are this week 'curtailed of our fair proportions,' in consequence of four pages being absorbed in a title and table of contents. We should most gladly have made these pages additional to our usual number, but that the stamp would not in that case carry them free through the Post-office, to the various parts of Great Britain. In our next, however, we shall have 'ample room and verge enough' to make up for all deficiencies in both quantity and quality. In binding, the table of contents will follow next after the title. We beg to return our hearty thanks to all our kind correspondents, for their numerous favours. Our office and establishment remain unchanged, so that we shall still be happy to hear from them through the usual channel. Miss S. will please favour us with the completion as soon as convenient, without the least dread of prolixity. We remember well the house of which she speaks in Paris.
